Before the railway was built, the farmer had little benefit from abundant crops. He could not send his product to distant places for sale and if the land in a particular district produces more than it needs, as in a good season. Prices fell and the farmer lost the profit he could have expected. Indeed, it often seems more economical to leave his crop to the secretary. The railways have uniformly changed the conditions that have made agriculture viable, improved communication which can be sent to any distance, resulting in prices at reasonable distances from the railways everywhere. When the harvest is plentiful, foodstuffs are no longer for the benefit of buyers, as farmers now have access to farmers all over the world.
